Overview

This half day event will look to explore key research around TA role and how this supports children and teachers to improve outcomes for children. It will include current thinking around effective deployment, working with pupils and using a scaffolding framework developed by the EEF.

Delegates will be provided with the opportunity to share best practice with colleagues from across the South West, as well as developing their skills in their role of a TA within the classroom and school setting.

About Sally Franklin

Sally Franklin is a co-ordinator for the EEF-funded Maximising the Impact of Teaching Assistants project. She also delivers the MITA school improvement course for school leaders and Maximising the Practice of TAs training for school staff.

Sally was the SENCo of a large primary school in South-West London for a number of years, and as part of this role managed and deployed a team of over 20 TAs, enabling Sally to have an excellent understanding of the legitimate barriers to effective TA deployment and practice. As a class teacher, she has taught across all Primary year groups.

Having worked with LAs to deliver SEN training and having advised on a number of local and national SEN projects, Sally holds a Masters degree in Pedagogy: Professional Values and Practice, and has a Postgraduate Certificate in Advanced Dyslexia teaching. Sally is also a lecturer on the NASENCo course at UCL and works as part of the Centre for Inclusive Education on a range of SEN research and knowledge exchange projects.
